THE LATTLE-RED-APPLE TREE. ames Whitcomb Riley, in St. Nicholas for Octobe The Little-lited-Apple Tree!

Oh, the Little-lited-Apple Tree!

Oh, the Little-lited-Apple Tree!

When I was the little-set bit of a boy,

And you were a boy with me!

The bluebin's slight from the topmost bous

And the boys up there—so high

That we rocked over the roof of the house,

And whooped as the winds went by!

Hot the Little-Red Apple-Treet With the garden beds below, And the old grate arbor so welcomely Hiding the rake and hoe— Hiding, too, as the sun dripped through in spatters of wasted gold, Ah! the Little-Red-Apple Tree! In the edge of the garden spot. Where the apples fell to darkship Into the neighbor's lot;— So do I this of you, Brother of mine, as the tree,— Giving the rippest wealth of your love To the world as well as me.

Oh, the Little-Red-Apple Tree!
Eweet as its judest fruit
Spanced on the patter spielty,
And rolled o'er the tongue to boot,
Is the memor still and the job of the Little-Red-Apple Tree,
When I was the little est bit of a boy,
And you were a boy with me!

FROM A LIVING DEATH

It was a pleasure indeed to be at home again after three years exploring the "Maister of Woodbarrow." Like all the representations at this theatre, every detail netago effect is carefully attendation to meet my old love. Emily Croyden, sgain made me doubly eager to get back. I felt a sudden chill run over me when I came to her house. Her stepfather, Joshua Penthroop, a man I had never liked, was standling in the doorway.

"Where is Emily?" I asked, eagerly, "Miss Croyden has been dead over a year," he replied, in cold, measured tones.

That was all he said. I cannot remember how I found strength enough to totter away on hearing this dreadful piece of news, but when I had recovered somewhat I found myself in the house of an old friend.

From him I learned that Emily Croyden had yone a year and a half are on a loving the performances of Aones.

somewhat I found myself in the house of an old friend.

From him I learned that Emily Croyden had gone a year and a half ago on a journey with Mr. Penthroop in search of health, and that she had died during the tour.

This calamity had proved too much for the poor mother to bear, and Mr. Penthroop returned home to find her dead, leaving him sole possessor of the home and fortune to which he had succeeded on Emily's death.

After that I could not endure to live at home, but wandered away from one place to another trying to find some occupation that would divert my mind from the past. At last I took a position as assistant in Dr. Durity's private insane asylum.

It was not by any means a sinecure.

The regions of the "Old Testanter of the whole establishment except the part assigned to "special cases," to whom none had access except the Doctor himself, and an old female servant as ugly as Hecate and as silent as the grave. This portion of the building had no connection with the rest, and the grounds adjacent to it were inclosed by a separate wall through which entrance was by a gate which was always kept securely fastened.

Dr. Durity had never invited me to visit this part of the establishment—had never spoken of it, indeed—and I was too much occupied with my duties to indulge in curiosity.

too much occupied with my duties to indulge in curiosity.

One day, however, during my hour of outdoor exercises, in passing the gate already mentioned I noticed that the key was in the lock; a thing that I had never observed before. I had never been forbidden to enter this part of the grounds, and saw no harm in stepping inside and taking a look around. The gate was unlocked and, pushing it open,
I passed in.

Before me was a wing of the main Before me was a wing of the main building, whose walls were pierced with tiers of barre windows from which the view was quite intercepted by the high surrounding wall. A gravel walk ran round the wing, and along it I was sauntering slowly, when I heard something drop at my feet. Looking down I saw a small gold ring which I hastened to pick up.

dead past?

Repressing an outcry to which I had almost given vent in the violence of my excitement, I looked up quickly and glancing rapidly along the rows of narrow windows. Behind the bars of the transfer that I see all the part of the transfer that I see all the part of the see all the part of the see all the parts of the parts of the see all the parts of topmost tier I saw a pale, worn face, at the sight of which I started as though it had been apparition. the sight of which I started as though it had been apparition. The face was that of Emily Groyden!

I would have called out, but she placed her fingers on her lips and pointed to wards the partly open gate with a gesture which I could not fail to understand. It meant that I should depart, keeping my own counsel till I had secured the means of her release. Making a sign to show my comprehension, I obeyed, softly closing the gate after me. Emily's safety, perhaps her life, depended upon the present concealment of my discovery.

The one glance of her face dispelled any doubt as to her sanity. Her wicked stepfather, it was evident, had coined the story of her death for his own selfish ends, and was carrying out the fraud through the aid of an unscrupnious accomplice, who would stick at nothing to avoid exposure.

I had been apparition. The face was that of Emily Mountains, discovered a root that when combined with other herbs, makes an II is in the form of dry roots and leaves, and is known as Lane's Family Medisting. I had gone but a little way when I had gone but a little way when I heard the gate open and saw the serving-woman coming out. She seemed frightened on discovering the key, which she quickly pocketed after locking the gate, meanwhile eying me suspicionsly. I pretended not to heed, and she passed on It was nearly dark when I returned to the asylum. I had been absent several hours, in fact, and when I went to the doctor's room, ostensibly to make out my doctor's room, estensibly to make out my evening report, he was beginning o re-primand, when I cut him short. The villain quaited in the presence of the law, and before many minutes I held Emily sobbing in my arms.

Joshua l'enthroop did not wait his step-daughter's return, but vacated at once the home to which he had no valid right, and in which we have dwelt ever since our marriage. Dr. Durity, too, decamped, to avoid false imprisonment, leaving an agent to dispose of his establishment.
